Re: McGuinty's fault, Sept. 24.

Letter-writer Armand Fournier is one of many citizens who make the argument that parents of children in private schools "should not have to contribute to a system they don't use."

This argument ignores the tax support by childless people for the public education system. Somehow, we never hear them complain. I suspect it is because they realize that an educated society benefits everyone, provided that the education is not perverted by propaganda.
